The three girls along with their mother are all talented instrumentalists and singers so they add to their income by entertaining on the weekend at the Roadhouse Cafe. The grandson, John Roselli, of an old friend from their previous home in Colorado appears with a package from his grandfather who has passed away. As soon as John arrives, trouble begins with their grandfather developing apoplexy and their mom asthma. But secrets from the past and secrets from the present collide to bring all sorts of problems descending upon the family.

Well written, with wonderful historical detail of both the time period as well as life and times in Nome led to a thoroughly delightful read. The three sisters were so different, but so gifted in both their singing and instrumental abilities. Whitney was strong-willed, independent, opinionated, as well as somewhat of a firebrand and felt she needed to be the support of her family. Havyn was sweet, loving (both people and her animals), and forgiving. Madysen, the youngest, was somewhat scattered; but tried her hardest to help out wherever she was needed. The role the animals played in the story was absolutely charming. The spiritual thread that ran throughout was very well done.

I look forward to the other books in this series.

4.5 Stars - Very Good Christian Historical Romance

I enjoyed the family dynamics, farm antics, and slow-burn romance.

Oh, the secrets people keep and just what hiding them can do. In Forever Hidden, we are introduced to the three Powell sisters along with their love of music and their headstrong, red-headed personalities as they find themselves dealing with circumstances they never expected.

Oh, the secrets people keep and just what hiding them can do. In Forever Hidden, we are introduced to the three Powell sisters along with their love of music and their headstrong, red-headed personalities as they find themselves dealing with circumstances they never expected.

I think my favorite part of this novel was the cast of characters. Even though this was really Havyn's story, I appreciated getting to know each of the other members of her family and how they'd all been shaped into the people they were. At different times I felt like I could resonate with each of them in a unique way. I also adored John. At times I'll admit he seemed "too good," but I still think he was the perfect man to save the day. I have to say his most swoon-worthy moment for me was when he talked to Havyn's chickens. I appreciated that he supported her instead of making fun of her love of animals. That's a good guy right there. Another favorite scene? The sheep herding. But I'm not saying anything more you'll have to read it for yourself haha.

Although at times I felt like I could resonate with each of the sisters, I think my heart resonated more closely with Whitney. She put a lot of weight on her shoulders and felt the most at peace when she could control things. Change was a scary thing. She liked to be needed and didn't like having to rely on anyone else. The anger she held onto towards her father was a fuel to protect her heart and not let others in. But while she bottled up all of her emotions and held them close, it didn't mean she didn't have feelings. She just had to learn how to process them and she couldn't pretend they didn't exist. I can't wait to read Whitney's book. I hope it's next just so I don't have to wait long for it.

If you've ever read any of the authors' other books, you'll know that faith isn't something that's merely added in, but holds a genuine, vital role. What I loved about this one was that while the overall lesson may have been the same, each of the characters had to learn it differently. As people none of us are the same. We have our own experiences and personalities that shape us into who we are. We each have our own secrets we'd rather not be revealed either for our own protection or that of others. Yet even though we can have the best intentions for why we keep them, they can still hold great power to destroy. It's amazing the healing powers that faith can have on a person's soul.

I truly enjoyed reading this one and can't wait to continue with the next one in the series. I'm only sad I have to wait another whole year for it to come. I got plenty of laughter out of the fun with the animals and I enjoyed getting to know each of the characters. I can't wait to see Whitney and Madysen get their happy endings as well.

My rating: 5 out of 5 stars

I always enjoy tales set in Alaska; it seems like such a beautiful place! Readers will enjoy the beautiful scenery described, the mystery involved and the three red-headed young ladies who are at the center of the novel. We meet their mother, Melissa Powell, as she raises three daughters in the rugged land and uses their musical talents

I really liked this book. I had to get used to the slower pace, but I think it was perfect for this story. I really enjoyed meeting the Powell sisters and their family. I loved their loyalty and love for each other. I also liked that they were so musically talented. I really liked John's character. I'm really looking forward to reading this whole series!
